

UN Climate Conference, Bali

Photographs by Orin Langelle and Anne Petermann/ Global Justice Ecology Project

Inside the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change

It's business as usual for companies pushing false solutions to the climate crisis.

Then there was outside of the convention center

Protests against palm oil...

Protests for climate justice

And against nuclear power

And on December 8 thousands marched in Denpasar, Bali as part of an international day of action against global warming.

Back at the conference center

Indigenous peoples protested their exclusion from the official proceedings

They protested the fact that they are being shut out from the negotiations even though it is their lands that are being looked at to provide the resources and carbon offsets to supposedly address global warming

It was a media feeding frenzy

And then the World Bank came

To announce their Forest Carbon Partnership Facility

While outside protests were held to demand the World Bank stay out of peoples' forests

Protesters held a die-in with people representing different ecosystems, peoples and countries threatened by lack of real action on climate change

There was a lot of passion

And then the negotiations finally ended...

With the U.S. bullying the rest of the world into taking a giant step backward in the effort to stop global warming with the so-called Bali Roadmap.